

Song of my battered soul

temi rose

I must lose this sadness Take it deep in the woods Make sure it has no bread To crumble on the ground It must not follow me home Again

I must lose the sorrow
This weight I carry in my thighs In my heart - the song That presses joy out and moves Me towards ledges, bridges and razors

I must lose this sense of being Unequal to the situation, incapable Of living a good life
I must lose this sadness

Come home alone in peace and tenderly Caress the night and my solitude I must lose this sorrow Bathe myself in light and forgive myself My trespasses as I have forgiven others who have trespassed against me

I will lose this sadness

From an ontology of everyday things to an epistemology of desire.

Perceptions

Perceptions
1304 Third Street
Catasauqua, Pa. 18032
<http://www.2cyberwhelm.org/perceptions>

ISSBN 0888-9058

women's poetry for a change issue # 61 spring 2004

$5.00/£ 3.50

temperance

rochelle hope mehr

I am suffocating on your good intentions they cut off my air supply what have you done? nothing so awful on the face of it but I wear down so easily when your hands grind me to a fault

I know you mean well but I can't change my face my way of looking at the world it may not please you but it's mine and I cling to it I won't put on the blush or cosmetically remove the scar to appease you leave me the bar leave me this last semblance of my sanity of my sanctity let me retain freedom so precious my own measured thoughts unfettered by exuberance can I call it poetry?

margaret boles

sometimes I feel bombarded with the weight of words waiting to be woven into a mosaic of sound and form the pressure of this task at times confuses as this jagged jumble erupts onto my page and then I wonder
can I call it poetry?

chandelier

rochelle hope mehr

it seems as if you can't get anywhere in this world except by crowding out others I can't grab opportunities like balloons and flit from job to job from man to man not if it means lording it over friends and loved ones those I've a loyalty to better than I I can't crowd them out let them capitalize let the balloons explode in their faces leave me safely, quietly ensconced

the woman and the moon

margaret boles

the woman and the moon
they are opposite sides of the same coin both are kin to the tides moon governs while woman is controlled by the living tides of life

silly

temi rose

in the middle of the night while we spend time dreaming and you sit alight a star and sing your darkness feeling sad and all alone don't despair silly one I am there and you are not alone not right

margaret boles

I can not 'not write' for writing helps me to make sense of 'we'
for you do not know where you end and where I begin and togetherness we find so hard to accomplish for it seems when we are together 'I' am wiped out

you are you
and I am me and writing helps me makes sense of me and of we

here I am again

temi rose

I came here looking for something
I came here looking for something I found more than I bargained for I came here to shed my skin I came here to begin by ending something what's it for?
accumulation of property accumulation of experience practice practice on the tight rope of existence out from nothing into emptiness
I came here looking for something
the city of light longing longing that's what I remember my baggage: twenty three years of desire the ribbon of the day

kathryn paulsen

Each morning Angela tied her hair in the ribbon on the day. She didn't have just seven the way girls have panties. She had colors and patterns, some of them raveled at the ends, all of them bent at the spots where the knots came, none of them washed in months or years. "I like you," Daddy used to say. "I like you with a ribbon in your hair." Yet he had never bought her one. She picked them herself. There were some so beautiful she hadn't dared wear them.

She liked to imagine herself in a dress of ribbons, all draped from one winding around the top of her bodice, blowing in the wind, exposing her thin flesh. But it would be expensive, so many ribbons. Sunday's was turquoise. It didn't match what she was wearing, but no matter. It was her mood. With a brilliant sky, as hot as hell, she flouted the clouds. She stroked and twirled her scanty pony tail and the rich, ridged grosgrain. That afternoon, she and Lela had had a fight over a toothbrush. Later they would wonder why. Later they would drop their eyes and apologize and put their heads together as if they were telling secrets and even kiss and let a tear or two paint pink lines on their cheeks. It was all show, purely for Daddy. Lela had a weak chin and was from Boston. Angela didn't like her.

Monday's was yellow. If the other girls condescended to criticize her, they might have said it brought out the sallowness of her complexion but she knew they wouldn't bother. She thought instead of velvet, toasty butter. It was nice to have enough of it to smear on whatever you wanted. Angela worried that the butter they got from the cow on their farm was too white. She worried, even though Daddy said it was the best butter. Angela's first chore of the day was to set the table for lunch. She used the metal tumblers they'd got from eight books of Green Stamps and she gave Daddy the gold one and herself the blue.

She couldn't give Daddy just any color; she'd never give him white or red or purple, and rarely brown or green. She couldn't tell you why, except that the white one had a permanent brown ring inside its joint from bad dishwashing. Except that something bad might happen, she couldn't tell you what. She wouldn't give herself those colors either; but sometimes, when she was feeling out of sorts, she'd give herself and another girl the same color, maybe the blue or orange. But no one else could ever have Daddy's color.

So when there wasn't enough tumblers to go around without using two gold ones, Angela had to ask Terry to wash one. Terry didn't like that one bit. She asked what was wrong with the other gold one, and Angela had to say it wasn't clean. Terry gave it a quick rinse, and Angela said it still wasn't clean. Terry said Angela was crazy; Angela said she'd wash the blankety-blank glass herself. Terry said why not use a glass-glass instead; there were plenty of those. Angela said she didn't think Daddy'd like it. And that settled that.

Tuesday she chose a pattern for change, though lately she'd preferred the pure true strength of colors, no fads. But this ribbon was sweet, a sweet striped powder pink and powder blue. "Ain't she sweet," she imagined Daddy singing to her, as he sang to one or another of them now and then, but less and less lately, "See her walkin' down the street. Now I ask you very confidentially...." That afternoon came her weekly trip to town. She went with Bobbi and Dana, whom she didn't mind, except for the silly way Bobbi spelled her name and topped the I with a circle or even a heart, even sometimes with an arrow through it. How childish could you get? But Bobbi drove the truck and drove it well. And Daddy called her a sergeant, whereas Angela was only a PFC. Angela thought it was about time she got a license, if only Daddy could find the time to teach her how to drive. In town they bought groceries, ate ice cream sundaes, and spent their allowances - Bobbi on movie magazines and stationary, Dana on two paperback mysteries and Angela on candy bars and ribbons, thin little ribbons she thought she'd wear two, three, four at once.

She was tempted by a black velvet one, but she didn't think she was ready for black velvet. On the way back Bobbi asked them what they'd wish for if they could have one wish. Bobbi would wish for one of those Mercedes with the diesel engines. Dana wished for trip to Paris, a whole year in Paris. "I don't know," said Angela when her turn came. "There's so much." Her mind was still on her ribbons. "Give me a minute and I'll think of something." But quickly they began talking about something else. Angela thought it was a good thing she hadn't told her wish, because if she had it wouldn't come true. And she thought there was a chance, just a chance but one worth keeping, that Daddy could see what wishes were in their hearts and grant them. She admired the brilliant sunset they were driving into even though it meant they were late for dinner.

Wednesday's was orange, a very old orange, turning brown at the tips but the rest of it still fine. Angela had never washed it or any of the others because she was afraid they'd fade or grow limp, even limper than they were for all the wearing. She never lent her ribbons, but then no one asked her anymore. Late in the day, Peggy Sue did a dance out front by the road, wiggling her hips a lot and swinging her arms. She was dressed like a harem girl, tied in lots of scarves, she had almost as many scarves as Angela had ribbons, and wearing bright red jewels on both hands and around her neck. She said they were rubies, and it didn't matter that they were made from taillights by kids at a farm down the road, because they looked like rubies. They twinkled and danced, better than Peggy Sue, Angela thought. Peggy Sue spent most of her time playing little 7 inch skinnydipping

barbara stacy

naked in the ocean of cold air I plunge into warmer water breaking the leafy shadows into rings that swim with me up and down this garden pool here is peace and such silence as if the world had knocked off for an afternoon and left me all the water on the planet for my wetness - brooks and lakes Nile and Pacific surging between my legs and I become an aquatic creature, finny joyous as a thousand fish shaking their tails dancing in the dark.

bon voyage

rochelle hope mehr

he yells now because the cancer has spread to his brain he yells at me for trying to spoon-feed him tuna fish says the pills make him ill he knows I mean well he'll get up tomorrow he's having bad dreams he has to sleep put out the light goodnight and I think we are all in some way touched in the brain none of us really well all of us hovering on a plain shitting in our underwear fuming in not-so-quiet despair not so gentle nor so brave as we fumble our way past the Everyday

My Environment

temi rose

Once upon a time a long long time ago there lived a princess with a heart of steel.

incomplete incense

failed for ever notice nothing stay in the place you started wrap yourself in substance enlarge your self after effects of shock include failed nervous system weakness intervening in each interaction fear mandates loss of control too rigid too stiff too much pain

don't stop

don't think

don't wait

keep it up

don't let go too hard to know

to own

it all

ama

mary laine yarber

She rounds her coral lips and whistles a robin's song flushing blood and air from lungs to make room for one last breath and dives ivory-nude but for fins wagging into pale and somber water a silent graceful arc sinking past orange ball anemones and purple tub sponge her lungs compressing under meters of green she can't hover long in the alluvial cave scooping crusted mollusks into a twined reed bag and must soon flutter-kick back toward a wet undulating sky where she will discover the one in ten thousand

prize

a lustrous ivory ovule chaste beneath

its filmy

nacre

veil

records on her portable record player and dancing around it. When she did it outdoors, boys would watch her, getting randy as squirrel, Daddy said, but he didn't mind. Daddy used to spend more nights with Peggy Sue than with anyone else. Angela knew because she counted. Lately Daddy'd been favoring Debby most, but he still spent a lot more time with Peggy Sue than with Angela.

Thursday's was red, but it didn't make her feel bloody. Or fiery either. To tell the truth, Angela had no imagination when it came to red, none at all. But that didn't mean she didn't like it as well as any of the others, better even. Thursday was her day to do the ironing, the job she hated most of all. She thought her turn had come too soon again, but Daddy didn't like complainers. The worst part of all was ironing things she knew belonged to Debby. If only she dared burn a hole in Debby's precious purple shirt. Of all the girls here, Debby was the one Angela hated worst. She hated the very name Debby, she would hate anyone else unfortunate enough to bear that name. Once Angela imagined, the way other people dream, that Daddy said to them, "Your names are all wrong, I'm going to rename you." And Lela became Gloria, Gloria became Peggy Sue, Peggy Sue became Lela, and Angela became Debby. She heard it like a stab in the heart. And she left for the kitchen, intending to stab herself.

Friday's was purple, but Angela hardly had time to choose. She rose just before four, when everyone was awakened by the screams of Gloria, whose baby was ready to be born. "He's coming out, he's coming out," she shrieked, but it was hours and hours til he finally did and she screamed all day. Daddy wasn't disturbed to hear her. "Sounds real healthy," he said, but he didn't come near her, not even into the room. He said it was woman's business. The only ones who stayed in the room were Jennifer, who was a nurse and finally delivered the baby in the afternoon, and Dana and Lela. Angela and the others fetched them food and things from time to time. Angela couldn't stand to look at Gloria who was white as a ghost and, Angela was sure, in danger of becoming one. Later, she wished she hadn't had to see the newborn still attached with its bloody rope to Gloria who just lay, still ghostly but quiet now, with her eyes shut. It made Angela want never to have a baby. Daddy always said he wanted her to have one, but he never could seem to find the time.

Saturday was white. Pure, colorless ribbon for a colorless day. The quietest day Angela could remember, everyone seemed busy elsewhere and chores were neglected or accomplished out of her sight. She wondered whether the others who were no doubt still attending on Gloria had moved her somewhere else. Gloria's room was the quietest place of all. Everyone but Gloria was at supper. But when Angela asked how Gloria was doing, girls just shrugged and shook their heads and said they didn't know, they hadn't seen her. Angela didn't like supper. Besides spaghetti, there were home canned green beans, which she suspected of botulism. It particularly disturbed her that her portion was the only one taken from the new can. If just one girl had taken seconds from the new can, Angela might have been willing to run the risk but no one did. So she moved the beans around with her fork and pushed them to the sides of the plate. "Angela, you haven't touched your green beans," Daddy said. "I'm too full," Angela said, assuming she would merely be deprived of dessert. "It was too big a helping."

"But you didn't eat any, did you? No one's leaving this table til Angela eats her beans, every one of them." Angela sat silent for a whole ten minutes. Everyone else was silent too, not looking at her, she could tell, though her own eyes looked straight ahead, but exchanging with each other sneers meant for her. They seemed to her to be talking about her silently to each other saying how much they despised her. Even Daddy? Even Daddy. She thought she could stand it, but she couldn't. It was just too much. Finally she crammed all the green beans into her mouth and swallowed them at once. She could feel them go down into her esophagus in one large lump. "Good girl," Daddy said. "Want some pudding?" Angela shook her head and ran from the table, without asking leave, to the toilet, where she tried unsuccessfully to vomit. Hours later she did vomit, though suddenly, and over and over and over. She was sure she was dying for the few minutes that were all she later remembered of the time.

The next morning's was green. She hardly felt strong enough to put it in her own hair but Dana said that was just because she needed something to eat. Dana brought her breakfast in bed. She was wearing a coat and carrying a large battered suitcase. When Angela asked her where she was going, she said just away for a few days. Then Angela asked how many days had passed since she'd got sick. Dana said no days at all; it was just the next morning. "Sunday then?" asked Angela. Dana said yes, and left. Angela woke again at dusk, feeling much better, though still a little groggy, and got up. She put on the freshly laundered but unironed bathrobe that was lying at the foot of the bed. She knew she should really dress but they'd make allowances. How would they know she wasn't still sick? She wasn't sure herself yet. The house was very quiet. She didn't hear the dinner sounds; it should have been about the hour unless it was earlier or later and everyone was outside. But usually she could hear what was going on outside.

In the empty room she began to be afraid. It was empty not only of girls but of many small objects, Daddy's fur pillow and rug, figurines, needlework. The fruit bowl and the flower jug had been taken from the dining room table. Angela walked through the whole house, through every room, and found all clothes and personal belongings gone though most furniture remained. There was food in the kitchen though. Angela opened some store-bought beans and ate them cold. After that she picked up the telephone

I keep a piece of paper
margaret boles
I keep a piece of paper
with her handwriting on it it's of no earthly use to me but something stays my hand were I to put it in the bin her hand was so consistent it's style, of her time it's etched in memories of long ago, before every individual would have had a phone, and so she would write to me
I keep a piece of paper
with her handwriting on it shopping list reminder note I cannot throw it out

the bone of the hawk
rochelle hope mehr
I do better approaching objects obliquely my directness warps me into tunnel vision and I miss the crux of the issue

I misled you, but not intentionally I was in the wrong path and bid you follow me I was able to swerve when the storm clouds gathered you were already past and I could not draw you in you told me to go away as the veil of death compassed you

I saw the shroud
the headstone
the bone of the hawk

they lie together

eleanor koldofsky

they lie together side by side naked warm moving freely for necessities that the passage of time demands - a tissue for sniffles reaching over each other to adjust lights papers pencils drinks leaving abruptly the opened divan for tea or coffee or peeing or champagne (the favorite) returning running back speeding tippy-toe into their room diving into the crumpled disarray of bedclothing sheets blankets comforter to find that warm length of body to stretch against the extended elegant arm the long well padded thigh the bodies coming together the always pleasure of the contact glancing off each other and returning in movements intimate and possessive proving oneness a unit talking of everything minds in free flight soaring agreeing teasing as little destruction as possible recalling early years without the other wondering of all wonders that they had met all the previous years preparing them for this however long it would last came up frequently for review eyes melting into each other's minds was sufficient reply turning to one another and lips brushing against cheek ear throat mouth while hands seek stiffening nipples dimpled buttocks muscled backs strong arms thighs moving smoothly freely form the swell of honeycomb juices welling up to prime the body for the gift the slackening of the thirst for love in which they indulged themselves the luxury of time adding an element of desire that they exercised in all ways that bodies may meet and caress languorously creating a fusion and exstasy that they had never known the silence small kisses sweet moans smiles of ownership. one receiver. The phone worked all right, but she didn't know who to call. The truck was gone, and all the bicycles but one with a flat tire. But it was too late to go anywhere anyhow. So Angela went back to her room, and it was there on her dresser where she should have seen it as soon as she got up, a note from Daddy. "Dearest sweetheart, baby Angela," it began, and said they had to leave suddenly for reasons that he would explain when he saw her. The rent and telephone were paid; if she wanted to order groceries from the store, they would be paid for too, an account had been opened for her. Someone had to stay, Daddy said. He couldn't force her to, but he asked her to. Daddy asked her to stay. She could but obey.

The ribbons would stay in their drawer til his return. He said he'd return but time passed. How much Angela didn't know, she did not keep track. She passed her time watching television, and walking around the grounds. She kept expecting a passerby to notice her but no one did. She did have some company. They'd left her the cow and some rabbits and chickens. It was lucky she liked eggs. She thought about tying a ribbon around the cow's bell, after Daddy came back.

anonymous

rochelle hope mehr

one day

I'll write something

I'll put it away

take it out later

and throw it away

I won't hound editors

with words of distress

I'll rip up the paper

I'll sweep up the mess

I'll pack my bags

find a new address and escape into namelessness

differentiation

rochette hope mehr

why does it bother me?

I shall have to read what the psychoanalysts say if I resemble her physically, does that make me her clone?

my father, as he lay dying, called me by her name and I tried to feed him does that make me a nurturing mom?

He died, after all, and I don't think he knew what hit him could have been a wayward tree could have been a bomb why does it matter, this business of differentiation?

this matter of falling far from the tree

I'd like to be the apple that falls so far and sounds nothing but dead air layers underneath

margaret boles

when we were four and five she brought us to live in the country now I know

she was running away in a sense running from herself and her own inadequacy in the country it would be easier to cover her tracks to rewrite history

pretend to a past

that wasn't hers

adopt

a sophistication she wasn't born with but wore as a glove so convincingly that she convinced herself that she'd lived

a different life

the apricot tree

mary laine yarber

I cannot eat an apricot without giggling just a wink finality

rochette hope mehr

it's strange how the eye is drawn immediately across the room as if nothing is gone is it that the space has shrunk?

collapsed into itself?

before it held a bed the bed held a man writhing in despair the man's breath got stuck in his throat his eyes fixated what did he last view in that huge blue stare?

the man is gone

the bed is gone

the space is gone too

as if it were never there sea longing

margaret boles

I'm going to sit and satisfy my sea longing and gaze out over the waves they're gentle today but more than lip-lapping I'll count for the seventh, the largest wave and smell the surf and spray a lone gull here and a trio there as they fly low over the sea the evening sun catches the white feathers sparkle and glint like rare jewels against the sky I will tell the sea rare secrets of things I barely know of spirits who loved and loved her long, long ago

ice

mary laine yarber

I was only out for cough drips and dinner, a desperate errand through lashing snow. But ragged and achy. I have sloughed home to the wrong house, two stories of mustard clapboard and a mailbox with one name newly scratched away. Your kitchen spills saffron across twilight and snapping wind, nearly reaching the shadowed curb where I watch. I can't see the table of thick knotted oak but still know the cobalt stoneware you have laid at its far end, the last dish not crunched underfoot. I paw muck from my nose as you light candles of evergreen on a side board, swirl cinnamon into steaming cider, and gaze out a window at spiteful flakes that whorl wisps of asthma into my choked lungs. Chill pierces my coat as steam wafts from the pot where you stir chicken into chowder. My eyes, swollen and glazed, weakly follow licks of firelight on your sable hair and when your head lalts and shoulders sway I know the long climbing stretch of Chopin is about to make you weepy, though all I hear is the soft clank of a street light swinging against the tap of flakes. I long to thumb the tears that sear your cheeks no longer mottled and bruised, but you don't believe promises sworn on the unsure light of stars.

league of hearts

temi rose

league of hearts
starts now at the end of enchantment at the loss of derangement at the time of the honeysuckle rain

the league of hearts was initiated in dark times came to be in the time when women spoke beyond their ability to comprehend they held back from logic worried that cold ratiocination would harm babies they were right logic does harm babies the thing is we grow up and live longer so age is now something to be reckoned with just as infancy was once the league of friends whose hearts I hold in mine will never vanish not death or mutilation not pain, humiliation or momentary grandeur will release us from the tender mercy of love shared known and unknown friends abide here

and our children

margaret boles

and our children
you cannot live their life for them you cannot dream their dreams for they live in the land of tomorrow they dream tomorrow's dreams

love me today
eleanor koldofsky
love me today, not tonight love me as I'm standing here not when I lie although, I am more vulnerable that way i'm here now the car is smashed love me now

love me in the daylight when all is hell not the moonlight night everything s'well

when the dinner is late when your boss is having a crisis nice is
love me today
don't love me for my sexy bits have your eggs and soggy chips with ketchup if you must but love me in the daytime and at night - carry on with lust love

eleanor koldofsky

once upon a time there was a beautiful canvas. large, white, shimmering, aglow with light; the brightest lightening white the canvas was suspended in time, floating and waiting. one day a painter searching the world for just such a canvas came upon it and with delicate and wonderful touching and devising; with magnificent colors of every hue; working devotedly, tenderly covered the canvas in a majestic design after resting and viewing and revelling in the splendor the canvas now portrayed, the artist once again in a marvelous display of ingenuity drew magical colors over the original pattern, causing the canvas to undulate with exstasy and self pride, being the recipient of such caressing strokes one more time the artist retired to contemplate this marriage of color and canvas. desire to complete and satisfy the loving canvas, now trembling with the knowledge of its worth and beauty, charmed the artist to cover slavishly and with even further perception the entire canvas with all of the brilliance of nature's colors - leaving at the top right hand corner an untouched circle. and from a circle of light left untouched, over which no color could ever be, the now magnificent canvas looked down upon itself with pride and pleasure at how beautiful it had become; never to return to the paleness of its previous self. the artist waved goodbye and blew a kiss which floated up to the circle and caused it to sparkle

the end